Course Description
Global Political Thought is another way of saying non-Western Political Thought. This is something that gets short shrift in much of Political Science. We start with the assumption that there is indeed something called “The West.” But once we travel out of this geographical and historical space, can we say that political thought changes according to how the “Non-West” defines itself? Or does it change according to how “The West” defines, elevates, or dismisses it based on similarity or difference? Or does it change at all? Do culture and historical context matter? These questions matter because they compel Political Science to consider how to better construct and categorize its ideas about politics across time and space.

To get at these questions, this course sits at the intersection of Political Theory and Comparative Politics. We will look closely at a range of scholarly works by non-Western thinkers in order to challenge some central political ideas of the so-called Western Canon. Much of this “Global” literature grows directly out of the reactions to Westernization of the non-Western world from around the 19th century to present. These reactions were quite critical, and certainly not trivial. At the same time, this literature allows us to examine a range of perennial political issues from a variety of non-Western perspectives. We can compare them to see if we can draw some generalizations about how politics works across different modes of political thought.

In other words, we will use this class to examine whether or not our default setting for political thought – Western political thought – is universal. Or do alternative modes of political thought have their own distinct logic derived from different contexts? We may also ask whether or not the whole intellectual exercise of distinguishing categories of Western and non-Western Political Thought, not to mention using fancy Western words like epistemology (the study of knowledge), and ontology (the study of being and the relations of things) are fundamentally Western academic constructs, and whether or not any of this matters to understanding how politics works. We will round out the class by critically examining the notion of American Exceptionalism, and see where this fits into the larger picture of Global Political Thought.
Course Objectives and Methodology
Students should come away able to:

- Demonstrate understanding of readings, analyze texts critically, effectively write papers, increase the quality of student’s reading, writing, debate and critical thinking skills
- Improve student’s understanding of how different theories define and approach the issue of development
- Distinguish their own views from those of others and can defend their own perspective

The course will be taught through readings, lectures, and class discussions:

- Readings. Reading primary sources is the best way to understand Global Political Theory. For each three-week part of this class, students will read an entire book, supplemented by weekly companion pieces that correspond to specific topics. This is an upper-level class, and students should expect to read 30-50 pages per class session. Students are expected to have completed the readings before these class sessions. Keeping up with the readings will be vital to your overall course performance, and it will be difficult to catch up if you fall behind. The knowledge acquired in the readings will be cumulative. That is, each week you will be introduced to new ideas that will become part of the "tool-box" you will use to analyze readings and lectures in subsequent weeks.

- Lectures. Each week will feature a specific topic and a corresponding lecture that will essentially serve as the “textbook” for the class, undergirding the readings and class discussions with key terms, concepts, and historical context.

- Discussions. Class discussions will be fundamental to this class and students are expected to participate. For one session each week, a different pair of students will lead a class discussion.

Course Requirements
Evaluation will be based on the following exercises:

- Critical Review Essays (50% of grade). For each major part of the course, students will write a 1,000-word thought essay. These essays must demonstrate comprehension of the text and the ability to explicate the text. Above all the essays should critically analyze and unify the central arguments of the books and companion pieces for that particular part of the course. Essays should be typed, double-spaced typed, with regular margins, 12 pt font, in Times New Roman, with page numbers, with a word count at the bottom, and stapled in the top left corner. They will be progressively weighted throughout the semester, giving students a chance to hone the skill of writing such essays. Essays are due on the following dates:

  September 20th (5%), October 11th (10%), November 1st (15%), November 22nd (20%)
• Final Essay (25%). Students will have an opportunity to tie together the arc of the course in a final, unifying essay that should reflect an “accumulated wisdom” of the semester. This Final Essay will be 2,000 words and is due the last day of class on Monday, December 1.

• Leading a Discussion (10%). Each Thursday, a pair of students will prepare a 10-minute presentation on the week’s readings and lead a class discussion. These presentations should include a concise summary, a critical analysis, and discussion questions for the rest of the class. Pairs and presentation days will be established according to the size of the class.

• Class Participation (15%). The quality of this class depends on the quality of discussion therefore students are expected to participate in class. Participation in the intellectual life of the campus is also part of this grade and students will receive credit for attending the key events that will be announced in advance.
